Week ending 6 August 2017

French summer lull

If you take a Eurostar to Paris this month, you'll find the French capital quiet and empty. Most people have left for the Atlantic Coast or the Mediterranean Sea and not much will happen for at least the next three weeks. As usual, the French economy goes into full holiday mode in August.

Since the election results, the portfolio managers are often asked if Macron will finally change things in France, if he will be able to revive the economy, fix the labour market or even if he will reduce the number of holidays! In a way, his victory has already changed France significantly. Anyone who regularly travels there would have noticed how the national mood has turned brighter. Consumer confidence which has been on an improving trend for the past four years is now back to pre-financial crisis levels while business confidence has rebounded significantly across the different sectors. The fact that Paris is now nearly certain to host the Olympic Games in 2024 should further boost the capital and encourage investment. People are feeling energised and there is hope that things will move forward. European equity inflows reached nearly $30bn during the first seven months of 2017 while the growth momentum in France and the rest of the euro area is picking up. Investors seem to be similarly upbeat.

But Macron faces a lot of challenges if he wants to turn a better national mood into a good economic story. While GDP growth has improved, it's still low relative to other countries. Unemployment has decreased to 9.6% but remains structurally high. On the political front, Macron needs to reduce the number of controversies to ensure his reform agenda can be completed during his term. The reforms his party wants to undertake, while maybe economically necessary, are painful and have already received some public backlash. He has a comfortable majority which should help him pass reforms in the Assembly but his MPs are less experienced politically and he is struggling to maintain discipline and coherence within his own party. While Macron's popularity is still relatively high, his approval ratings have started to fall.

The month of July saw many controversies arise for the new French government, including the resignation of the head of the army following unexpected budget cuts to the military and the announcement by the budget minister of a €5 cut to the housing benefit which might disproportionately hurt the poorest. Discontent also remains high in the countryside, especially in the North and South-East where the National Front won a greater share of the vote. Street protests are likely to take place in September and the new government should move carefully to avoid mobilising more people if it wants to limit their scale. On the international side, Macron is a pro-European and is very keen to push for a more integrated Europe but his tendency to deal with issues single-handedly and his focus on Germany are at risk of alienating other countries, further limiting his political power to drive any real political and economic changes.

The managers of the core portfolios have chosen to stay overweight Europe as they continue to prefer the rest of the world relative to the overpriced US market, but they do recognise that expected returns are less attractive than at the start of the year and therefore remain cautious. As investors were overestimating risks going into the elections, they might now be underestimating the risk that Macron may not be able to push all his reforms through, at both domestic and European levels. Expectations are high and arguably oversized.

As for holidays, the managers doubt Macron will make any changes as there is little reason to do so. French people might take more holidays than the Brits but the overall productivity in France is higher; a report from the ONS indicated that in 2015 UK workers produced on average 22.7% less per hour than workers in France. Although there are some questions about how comparable the UK and French systems actually are, it raises the question of whether the UK should have more holidays ...
